

Vorreth

THE ONE WHO KEEPS THE HIVE

Vorreth is not found — she is encountered. Where her kin rests among clover and waits, Vorreth moves with purpose through the tall grasses, her long body low to the ground, wings flat and ready.

Her colouring is the same deep black and amber yellow, but worn differently — bolder, higher contrast, spread across a broader frame. The sunflower petal clusters along her back are full and heavy, not delicate tufts but proper blooms.

She appears in the fullness of summer, when the flowers have opened completely and the warmth has nothing left to prove. She is the season at its height: not arriving, not ending, simply here.

You know when Vorreth is paying attention. She does not announce herself. She simply arrives, already certain.
